In the haste to get things ready we understand one or two articles were found with the old price tickets unaltered. This we regret, because our idea was to reduce the price of everything.

During this week things will be in a better shape, and the clerks, a great many of whom were new to the store, will be better acquainted with the stock and their own surroundings. We mean to keep our success succeeding. Fresh fuel will be added every morning, and our determination to make this a memorable sale knows no abatement.

We feel we owe an apology to the public for the altogether inadequate service rendered them since the opening of this sale. We expected a storm, but were not quite prepared for a cyclone. We appreciate the reception accorded us and feel stimulated for further endeavor. As for the goods themselves, we have no apology to make—none is required.
